In your city built with concrete and lies. We have slaved away so lifeless. With every breath a compromise. So sickened by your process and our pain. Plaque by the fear of a tomorrow, another day in vein, we can throw all this away. Trading our sorrow for sin. We can throw all this away. For too long we have starred. For too long we have fucking stayed so blind to every instinct as you paved the way. So tomorrow we will take back every year you stole from us, and every night silently desperate and hopeless. Every dream never realized, and every tear shed from these eyes. We will sin and you will suffer. We will set fire to vour machines. We will put life back into hearts and you will suffer. We will run life through our veins and you will suffer. Passion will be found in time, and your world will fall behind us. Under your dark polluted skies, we may live as the damned. But our essence and soul and freedom will unfold. And only in death shall we see the end. For as long as the light of the sun still dances across every sea. We will know there is something to live and die for, and we will know every breath to be free.