The way that she cuts through a room Makes me want to exhume the madness That flits between our lips like dynamite And a moistened wick so You feel like a firefly Whose lamp's unlit And smothered by The bed, the sweat, the dawns of the past, the taste of the small of an old lover's laugh so You bust your bank try to build a better bang for your buck, DNA to out distance the tethers that you're tied to the family lines that will hang you out to dry and you wonder why our hearts are such hungry beasts the harder we starve them the more all-consuming and I understand they'll never find the love that they need so we try to run 'em into the ground as I watch her unpack her hair like stacks of black pyramids so I smile like a crack in a dam or a condemned chair to electric man so (she wants stability) what's that I can't hear you? (she wants stability) so I'll go and buy her a pony (she wants stability) I'll lay my head on a goddamn platter (she wants stability) but in the end, it doesn't really matter 'cause our hearts are such hungry beasts the harder we starve them the more all-consuming and I understand they'll never find the love that they need so we try to run 'em into the... our heads are bottled up by the most heathen thoughts our bodies hang in limbo of what we need and what we want she's a cutter but I love her just the same undercover but I never learned her real name [x2] she's a gutter but I love her just the same undercover but I never learned her real name (I'm an old man, I'm only getting older, the world gets younger as I push bo ulders)
