Up Into the Pear Tree

Heather Dale

The young Madonna Lydia went out to take a stroll Upon the arm of Don Ambruglio, her newly wedded lord. Their serving man was Pyrrhus that day, as chance befell and though he was the husband's man, he longed to be her man as well.

Sweetly said Madonna with a twinkle in her eye, "I see a tree hung low with fruit; and oh! The highest one is ripe."

The Don looked sagely upward, and he nodded his assent And so the servant stripped to shirt and hose, and up the tree he went.

Up into the pear tree was handsome Pyrrhus sent And there he thought of a clever plan, and this is how it went

When the noble pair below were seated on the ground, From up above, young Pyrrhus made a show of shyly looking down

"My lord, I cannot blame you -- but it seems to me unwise

To kiss your wife so boldly here, and right before a servant's eyes!"

Ambruglio was taken aback, "My boy, what's that you say?

My wife and I are sitting here, and not entwined in Cupid's play."

Said Pyrrhus, soul of innocence, "My eyes cannot agree. But here, come up and take my place, my lord - perhaps it is the tree."

So up into the pear tree the foolish husband went While Pyrrhus thought of the prize below and hastened his descent

There's nothing quite as pleasant as a summer's warm embrace

And when the Don looked down he saw the ardent lovers face to face

But to his cries the two below said simply, "What's the fuss?

Just as before, a yard or more still separates the two of us."  $\ensuremath{\text{^{\circ}}}$

The Don gasped, "It's a miracle! Let's cry it in the town!"

But with a smile, Madonna said, "I think that you should cut it down;

What good's a tree which lays a doubt on wives of good repute?

So Pyrrhus felled the pear tree, as was his first intent

And once he'd finished his sweaty work, his vigour was all but spent.

The wondrous tree was lost; Ambruglio ne'er guessed the game

But still the tale went far and wide and garnered  $\mathop{\text{\rm him}}\nolimits$  a certain fame

Lydia was happy with this pleasant stroke of luck And always called upon her Pyrrhus when she had some fruit to pluck.

And up into her pear tree was handsome Pyrrhus sent For there he'd thought of a clever plan, and that was how it went.