The Comet, the Course, the Tail

Peter Hammill

They say we are endowed with Free Will - at least that justifie s our need for indecision. But between our insticts and the lus t to kill we bow our heads in submission. They say that no man is an island but then they say our castles are our homes; it's felt the choice is ours, between peace and violence... oh, yes, we choose, alone?

While the comet spreads its tail across the sky it nowhere near defines the course it flies, nor does it find its own directio n.

Though the path of the comet be sure, its constitution is not s o its meaning is possibly more than the tracing of a tail in on e brief shot at glory.

Love and peace and individuality, so order and society are manmade? War and hate and dark depravity, or are we slaves? Channe ling aggressive energies, the Death Wish and the Will to surviv e, into finding and preserving enemies, is that the only way we know that we're alive?

In the slaughterhouse all corpses smell the same, whether queen s or pawns or innocents at the game; in the cemetery a uniform cloaks the graves except for outward pomp and circumstance.

There is a time set in the calendar when all reason seems barel y enough to sustain all the shooting stars: times are rough. I'm waiting for something to happen here, it feels as though it's long overdue... maybe a restatement of yesteryear or something entirely new.

And the knowledge that we gain in part always leads us closer to the very start, and to the founding questions: How can I tell that the road signed to hell doesn't lead up to heaven? What can I say when, in some obscure way, I am my own direction?
